Excerpt: . inspected, repacked, the material loaded on a truck and taken to the shipping room where the covers of the boxes are nailed on. Some of the material going into bottles must remain uncorked for from twenty-four to thirty-six hours. Bottles containing this material are sent up into a temporary storage room where they undergo additional handling. There is a continual picking up and putting down of material, constant wastes of energy and time. This occurs in every factory to a more or less extent, the amount depending in a great measure upon the consideration given the subject of transporting materials in the most economical and efficient manner. If this factory had been designed with a view to efficient routing and transporting of the factory products, the bottles would have been placed in some form of conveyor and passed directly to the cleaning department,...
